Program Notes

Trio élégiaque No. 1 in G Minor

Sergei Rachmaninoff

Rachmaninoff had a precarious and emotionally fraught childhood. His father dissipated the family fortune and they had to move several times, his sister died in a diphtheria epidemic, and his parents separated. Yet he remained enrolled at the St. Petersburg Conservatory until 1885, when he failed all of his academic subjects (in part, at least, because his now single mother was no longer supervising his homework). That led to him being transferred to the Moscow Conservatory, where he was boarded with a notoriously strict piano teacher, Nikolai Zverev.

That proved to be a blessing for his career, as Rachmaninoff became one of the most prodigiously skilled virtuosos on the keyboard. And at Zverev's apartment, the young musician met many of the leading Russian musicians of the day, including Tchaikovsky and Arensky. Rachmaninoff studied harmony with Arensky at the Conservatory, but it was Tchaikovsky who proved the most influential, as an idolized mentor.

In January 1892, Rachmaninoff made his official debut in Moscow, playing solo pieces by Chopin, Liszt, and Tchaikovsky, plus some of his own chamber works: two pieces for cello and piano, and his Trio élégiaque in G minor, which he had written less than two weeks before the concert in just four days.

Like most of his music of this time, this trio was highly influenced by Tchaikovsky, though the voice is already clearly Rachmaninoff's own. It is cast in a single long movement, with pronounced similarities to the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Piano Trio in A minor, composed in 1882 after the death of Nikolai Rubinstein, Tchaikovsky's friend, teacher, and the director of the Moscow Conservatory. Tchaikovsky's long first movement was called "Pezzo elegiaco" (Elegiac Piece), and like it, Rachmaninoff's "Elegiac Trio" ends with a funeral march. There are other points of reference to Tchaikovsky, but the Trio's powerful sweep, along an arc of growing animation before the somber close, is pure Rachmaninoff.

Almost two years later, Tchaikovsky died after a sudden illness (and before conducting the premiere of Rachmaninoff's orchestral fantasy The Rock, as he had wished). Rachmaninoff turned again to this format, composing a second Trio élégiaque in memory of his mentor.

Piano Trio

Reena Esmail

Program note by Aaron Grad, written for the work's 2019 premiere.

"I wish I could live in India and America at the same time," says Reena Esmail (b. 1983), the daughter of Indian immigrants who has become one of the most respected young composers in the United States; "I wish they shared a border, and I could build a little home right in between them. I know I can't do that in the physical world, but this is where I live every day in my music."

Esmail's compositions straddle two of the world's most sophisticated musical traditions. On one side is the art music of Europe and its system of tonal harmony that developed over the last 400-plus years, and on the other, Hindustani classical music from North India, organized around collections of tones known as raags that go back many centuries further.

Studies at the Juilliard School and the Yale School of Music grounded Esmail in the practices of the West's classical music, including its precise system of notation that allows performers of any background to interpret unfamiliar nuances. As a Fulbright-Nehru Scholar, she was able to spend a year in India studying the classical music of her ancestors, absorbing the oral tradition built on complex patterns and pitches that often can't be categorized within Western norms.

Writing a Piano Trio has fulfilled one of Esmail's oldest ambitions as a musician. Growing up as a talented pianist, trios with violin and cello were her favorite form of chamber music, and she won a life-changing competition that resulted in her performing Mendelssohn's Second Piano Trio with members of the Los Angeles Philharmonic. She also counts Ravel's Piano Trio as an all-time favorite work, noting, "So much of what I've learned about color and texture in my writing comes from Ravel." After three years of work and a pile of sketches that is up to 300 pages and counting (with less than three weeks to go before the premiere), Esmail is still polishing off this substantial score that reckons with the rigorous tradition of the four-movement piano trio.

Authentic raags appear in each movement of the trio, including the monsoon season raag known as Megh that informs a chorale from the strings and other gestures in the first movement. In a tempo marked "Ephemeral," the smooth modal phrases and long slurs highlight Esmail's affinity with Ravel, who also looked outside the Western canon to expand his shimmering soundscapes. Flutters, slides and harmonics continue in the slow movement, creating a sense of improvisatory freedom while the music slips in and out of time.

By casting the quivering third movement as a scherzo, Esmail acknowledges her debt to Mendelssohn (the king of those elfin, lighter-than-air diversions), but moments of manic hilarity and sheer muscle recall a more subversive master of the piano trio, Shostakovich. In the finale, a singing string melody supported by “luminous” piano filigree surges to a droning climax marked “powerful, broad, intense.”

When the unhurried ending arrives with glimmering harmonics and crystalline chords, this work completes an arc that places it squarely within the storied lineage of the “classical” piano trio – while making it clear just how irrelevant such boundaries truly are.

Piano Trio No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 90 “Dumky”

Antonín Dvořák

Program note by Herbert Glass, courtesy of the L.A. Philharmonic.

The spirit of folk music, which is to say folk stylizations, since the melodies are inevitably his own, is at the heart of Antonín Dvořák’s mature compositions. In his Op. 90, the last of the great Bohemian’s four trios for piano, violin, and cello, he is both at his most original and his folksiest: even the formal layout is derived from the music of “the people” rather than from a classical style.

The Trio was completed in Prague in 1891, following a string of successes and unprecedented acclaim within and outside the Czech borders. Dvořák had recently been appointed professor of composition and instrumentation at the Prague Conservatory. An honorary doctorate from Cambridge followed. In Germany, the Hussite Overture (from 1883) and the recent G-major Symphony (Op. 88) were rapturously received; the likewise recent E-flat Piano Quartet, Op. 84, and the Piano Quintet in the same key (written three years earlier), Op. 81, met similar approbation at their first Vienna performances and then throughout Germany. England, which had already capitulated to him and his creations a decade earlier, was honored (in Birmingham) with the world premiere of his Requiem in October of ’91, several months after his being invited to assume the directorship of the newly established American Conservatory of Music in New York, resulting in a four-year-long sojourn on these shores. It was in all a good year. A very good year.

The subtitle of the Op. 90 Trio, “Dumky” (plural of dumka), describes the style of all six of its movements, a dumka being a Slavic (some sources state specifically Ukrainian) folk song marked by abrupt changes from doleful to exuberant. Op. 90 was introduced in February of 1891 by violinist Ferdinand Lachner, cellist Hanuš Wihan, to whom Dvořák would later dedicate his Cello Concerto, with the composer at the piano. The performance took place in conjunction with Dvořák's being awarded an honorary doctorate by the Charles University of Prague. Tradition has it that pre-publication proofs were read by his good friend Johannes Brahms while Dvořák was in America.

It isn't obvious at first, but the work has a discernible form, although not the sonata form of Dvořák's prior trios. The first three dumky are a subtly connected whole: "confirmation of this," according to Dvořák scholar Otakar Sourek, "is not only in the 'attacca subito' after the first two, as compared with 'a short pause' after the others, but in the logical unity of the content, from the cries of anguished lamentation to quiet mourning, followed by the heart-balm of consolation and reconciliation, and also in the strikingly close key relationships: the first dumka in E minor (at times E major) concluding in the key of C-sharp minor, in which the second dumka remains throughout, while the third set is in A major."

Also worth noting is that while the first three dumky are contrasted as mentioned above, a single mood dominates two of the next three: the march-like fourth is the work's pensive slow movement, although here as in the subsequent dumky there is just enough contrast to remain true to the form; the energetic, contrapuntal fifth is its scherzo. The finale, alternating between C major and C minor, reverts to the even-handed alternation of the mournful and effervescent that characterizes the first three dumky.
